The principal medium in which Maori artistry finds expression to-day is the totara-wood in which carvings are made, and interior painting in red, black and white, for the communal meeting-house—the whare-whakairo (carved house), whare-hui (assembly-house), or whare-runanga (council-house), as it is variously called. In former days the war-canoe figureheads and stern posts were beautifully carved, but this branch of the olden artcrafts has still to be revived.
